Tianisha was unable to work for almost a year after having emergency surgery from an unexpected illness. Her recovery took longer than expected, causing her to use up all her medical leave days, including three additional months without pay granted by her employer. But still unable to work, she was eventually fired from her job.

“Bills were stacking up, I was behind on my mortgage, and I didn’t have a lot of help at the time,” said Tianisha, a single mother with two daughters. “It was like I didn’t have anything to fall back on. There were times when I didn’t know how we were going to make it or what we were going to eat.”

In the midst of her predicament, a friend suggested Tianisha contact The Salvation Army. That’s when she learned about our Home Sweet Home program, which helps families that are about to fall into homelessness stay in their homes.

After Tianisha enrolled in the program, we paid her mortgage for six months and gave the family groceries from our food pantry. We provided financial education classes that helped Tianisha learn how to budget and save money. Our case manager made home visits to make sure she attained stability.

After almost a year of being unemployed, Tianisha got a job at the Dallas Police Department.

“I feel like I’m in a great financial situation right now, thanks to the help that I received from The Salvation Army,” Tianisha said. “If I had not gone to The Salvation Army, I would have definitely lost my home, which would have caused me to become homeless with my kids.”
