The museum was originally housed in the beautifully restored Carnegie Library Building, constructed in 1904. A major expansion in 2006 provided and additional 10,000 square feet of space, which allowed the museum to expand its mission to include providing quality traveling exhibitions such as “The Inspired Line: Selected Prints from Albrecht Durer and Rembrandt van Rijn,” hosted in the summer of 2009.

The Gault Site: A Wealth of New Archeology Information

The Gault Site has been home to human beings for over 13,000 years. This historically rich ecotone enabled early peoples to forage the uplands and the stream valley where different kinds of plants and animals were found. Just as important as the wealth of food sources is the seemingly endless supply of chert at the site, which was readily crafted into tools and weapons. To date, the excavations have uncovered almost 2 million artifacts; some of which are from the Clovis period (13,300 to 12,900 years ago). The analysis of this material provides archaeologists with a unique look into the lifestyles of the earliest people in Texas and, by extension, the earliest peoples in the Americas.

Bell County Museum is home to a permanent interactive educational exhibit featuring discoveries of the Gault Site. Guided walking tours to this site are available through the museum.

The Bell County Courthouse was built in 1884-1885 and is a prime example of Renaissance Revival architecture. Exterior characteristics of the style include a rusticated ground floor with Roman arches and monumental arcaded recessed galleries. The beautiful clock tower and goddess of justice provide an especially dramatic view at night.

Fun Fact: Both Belton and Bell County were named after Peter (I-might-just-be-a-Colonel-but-I've-got-a-Texas-County-named-after-me) Bell. Bell was a mere Colonel in the Civil War, but was a Mexican War Veteran, and before that, a San Jacinto Veteran. In his spare time he was a Texas Ranger, a Congressional Representative and a Governor.

South Belton Cemetery has two 1936 Texas Historical Commission markers and many of those buried here contributed to the development of Belton, Bell County, and Texas. The cemetery is located approximately a half mile east of the town square at the 600 block of South Penelope Street.
